Corrigendum

Bob Barnetson, Jason Foster (2015). “If it bleeds, it leads: the construction of workplace injury in Canadian newspapers, 2009–2014”, International Journal of Occupational and Environmental Health, 21 (3), 258–265. DOI: 10.1179/2049396715Y.0000000003.

When this article was first published online, reference to the following prior submission was omitted:

Tim Gawley, Shane Dixon (2016). “One side of the story: Examining newspaper coverage of workplace injury and fatality in Ontario, 2007–2012”, Work, 53, 205–218. DOI: 10.3233/WOR-152140.

The authors acknowledge the publication by Gawley and Dixon as conceptual and methodological inspiration for their article and apologise to the authors for this omission.

Letter to the Editor

Bob Barnetson

Labour Relations, Athabasca University, Edmonton, Canada

Dear Editor,

In 2015, the International Journal of Occupational and Environmental Health published an article I co-authored with Dr. Jason Foster entitled “If it bleeds, it leads: the construction of workplace injury in Canadian newspapers, 2009–2014” (2015, 21 (3), 258–265; DOI: 10.1179/2049396715Y.0000000003).

I am writing to extend my sincere apologies to the editors and readers of the IJOEH for my failure to acknowledge the conceptual and methodological contribution made to this article by Dr. Tim Gawley and Dr. Shane Dixon’s article entitled “One side of the story: Examining newspaper coverage of workplace injury and fatality in Ontario, 2007–2012” Work, 2015, 53, 205–218.

I was a blind reviewer for the Work article in 2014 and I was very excited to read its conclusions about the quantitative mis-representation of injury in Ontario newspaper reports. After recommending the article’s publication, I discussed the article’s approach and findings with Dr. Foster. We subsequently worked out a plan to test Drs. Gawley and Dixon’s conclusions with a national data-set as well as extend the analysis with a qualitative analysis of the media frames in the articles.

As these things sometimes happen, our IJOEH article was published slightly ahead of the Work article. I profoundly regret failing to determine who the authors of the original article were in order to properly acknowledge their conceptual and methodological contribution. We have acknowledged the work of Drs. Gawley and Dixon in subsequent articles. In addition to apologizing to Drs. Gawley and Dixon, Dr. Foster, and the editors of Work, I have disclosed this profound error to my university as per the requirements of its Research Integrity Policy.

Please accept my sincerest apologies for my lapse in judgment.